Latterly, he was attached to I. Flak Division, Berlin and invented and put into operation a dial system whereby Flak Radar operators, hearing their on battery open fire, dialled two numbers, representing the height at which the battery was engaging, which were then immediately transmitted to the Commanding General's Watch Room where they were illuminated as numbers on a glass screen. In this way, the Commanding General could see at a glance which batteries were engaging the enemy and the height at which they were shooting. This system had advantages in speed and manpower over the manual system and was so successful in operation that it was proposed to embody the use of a four figure number in order to transmit additional data.]
